War College Group Hears CIA Member

CARLISLE—A member of the Board of National Estimates of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) addressed the opening session yesterday of the 13th National Strategy Seminar at the U.S. Army War College.

Richard Collins talked to more than 300 seminar participants, surveying the present world situation and examining projected trends affecting U.S. security.

The seminar marks the end of the 10-month curriculum for the 205 select officers who are War College students. More than 100 prominent civilians and military leaders from across the nation come to the war college every year to participate.

A retired Army major general, Collins began working in Army intelligence following World War II. He was named to his present position after retiring from active duty in 1962.
